"The true purpose of Arts education is not necessarily to create more professional dancers or artists. [Its] to create more complete human beings who are critical thinkers, who have curious minds, who can lead productive lives." Says the Director of the Center of Creative Arts in St. Louis, Kelly Pollack. As a teacher I strive to encourage my students to become more creative in their thinking. It is important that in my class students are taught skills that will travel beyond the doors of the art room. The Geisler Art Room is transitioning into becoming a Choice-Based Art Studio. Which means that the students are guided on their own creative journey. For students this means that the classroom is an art studio where they get to create and make the art that is apart of them. For parents this means that students will be working at their own speed. This does mean that often their grade books may look a bit messy, but we will clear everything up by the end of the marking period.
